

PARAFACT #3: The Necropolis Mistake by Reverend Fuzzy

As I'm sure a lot of you have noticed, quite a lot of "ghost hunting" has increasingly centered in a cemetery venue. As good an idea as this may sound like on paper, in reality, the hunt is not a good idea within the confines of a cemetery. At this point, I'm sure many of you readers, who have actually done some of your hunting at cemeteries, are starting to roll your eyes, and considering reading something else. Fine, that's your right to do so. However, before you plan your next in-cemetery hunt, you might want to give me the benefit of the doubt, and continue to read the rest of this article... you just might learn something new, that could help you out.

Ok, if you're still reading, then you've got the good sense to listen to advice based in common sense, logic, and experience. First, what is the one thing that we've all learned that the majority of hauntings have in common? It's the fact that human souls that failed to "cross over", tend to haunt near or close to the general location at which they'd passed on. So, what is the likelihood that someone actually passed on in a cemetery?

Think about it, and do the math... the actual number of possible in-cemetery deaths that could have taken place since said cemetery was first consecrated, is quite dismal at best. The few candidates we have are mourners, fatally overcome by grief, or cemetery workers overcome by overwork. So where are all the voices coming from that people are capturing in EVP's, photos, and videos? The answer to that is not quite as surprising... aside from the legitimate few human souls that actually ARE haunting the cemetery, and the few people that fake it to get their 15 minutes of fame, we have the ones we know as the diabolic entity, or demon.

Demons, as most of you are probably aware by now, will lie, cheat, and steal to make an effort to claim your body and/or soul. Many will choose to assume the form of a "ghost" in the voice and gender of the person whose name is engraved on the closest headstone. Enticements will be made to get you to "invite" them. And the worst part is, being the evil that they are, if for any reason they believe you to be an easy mark, or can be manipulated easily, they will follow you back to your home to further torment you and/or your loved ones...not good.

I'm not saying that ALL the entities that you contact in a cemetery will be demons, but what I am saying, is that the probability of it is extremely high, and the risk is high enough to make it not worth your time, efforts, and soul. It's like a Ouija board... you have no way of knowing who (or what) you're contacting. It's a sick, sad world, so be careful out there.

Yours In Christ,

Rev. Fuzzy
